child. As easer hands, while they awaited an ambulance, made for him a bed on a sandpile, on which a moment before a dozen laughing children had been at play, he bemoaned incessantly the fate of his daughter.

Then came Mrs. Goldfeder, attracted by the screams of women, the hoarse shouts of a man and, finally, the surging crowd. At the sight of the body of her dead baby and her wounded husband under the car she became hysterical.

He applied the emergency brakes, but the car was beyond his control. He saw this baby allhouetted against the glare of the headlight, he saw the approaching car and its deadly menace.

With a scream he ran forward and seized the child, but too late. The car struck him and the small body was knocked from his grasp and fell under the forward trucks.

In some way the man escaped the forward trucks. The fender of the car
